Guest Speaker: Robert Tickner, AO

In his current roles as Chair of the Justice Reform Initiative, Robert spoke on Justice Reform.

Australia has followed the US model of locking criminals away, spending $7 billion on running prisons and $7 billion on Youth Detention Centres with very poor outcomes. After release, 80% of youth are back in detention within 12 months and the figures are similar for adult prisoners.

The Justice Reform Initiative is a cross-party body with support from eminent citizens, and prominent organisations who are lobbying governments to change the focus of the current system. It also looks at reforming how the victims of crime are treated, changing the focus from vengeance to a more collaborative and understanding model such as Enough Is Enough.

If we look at who is in detention, the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare found it is the uneducated, the mentally ill, the disabled, the unemployed and the drug and alcohol addicted. When it comes to children, as many as 80% are on remand but cannot be bailed as they have no home to go to. The Productivity Commission found that the operational cost to keep a young person in detention is $1m p.a.

There are now some signs of a more enlightened approach in policy such as the Macquarie Correctional Centre in Wellington where the premise of treating the inmates with respect as humans and providing education and training has reduced the level of violence. At present 99% of public money is spent on incarceration and 1% on alternatives. The balance must be shifted.
